She also explained that the lack of menstrual hygiene products is known as 'period poverty' and making it available for all females will make a 'period friendly world'. The talk was primarily aimed at interns and nursing students, the younger generations and the future of our nation, who would serve as a vital link between the healthcare system and the community and create awareness regarding this issue. This interactive session sparked engaging discussions about various menstrual products, their advantages, and potential risks. The event was attended by 120 people and received unanimous appreciation. On this occasion, the annual free cervical cancer screening camp for the female staff of the institute was also announced to support women's health.
